

With the Oscars, it's all in the stars

By John Tanasychuk and Liz Doup
Staff Writers
Posted February 24 2005

I do! I do! (want an Oscar)

Clint Eastwood may be the best-known divorced guy in the race for best actor, but that doesn't influence Beverly Pekala's decision.

No sirree, this Chicago divorce lawyer and author of Don't Settle for Less: A Guide to Divorce, likes the twice-married Eastwood, thanks to his terrific track record. In movies, if not in marriage.

With a trio of chances, count on Eastwood taking home an armful of metal, she predicts. He has a shot at best actor and best director, and his Million Dollar Baby has a chance at best film.

But younger, single nominees -- say, The Aviator's Leonardo DiCaprio or Ray's Jamie Foxx -- can hold out hope. For getting hitched, that is. Pekala isn't so sure about the Oscar.

The deal is, statistically speaking, most guys eventually marry, she says. And when the time comes, Pekala has savvy advice for Oscar winners -- not as a movie director but as a divorce lawyer.

"They can hold the Oscar in one hand and a pre-nup in the other."